The initial goal of this research was to better understand the mechanism by which environmental and genetic insults cause cancer by identifying the genes involved in the process. Three major cancer types were chosen, because of their prevalence, their importance as quality of life problems, and their need for new therapies: lung cancer, breast cancer and melanoma. A common theme has emerged from the molecular analysis of these 3 cancers - the role of mitogenic and anti-apoptotic signals that emanate from the EGFR (ErbB) receptor tyrosine kinases. The EGFR has 3 ligands, Epigoneogene, TGF-alpha and Neuregulgin-1. Over-expression of these ligands is a common feature of several common cancers, including breast cancer. The initial studies indicate that up-regulation of the EGFR and its ligands is required for the growth of these cancers, consistent with the role of the EGFR as a mitogenic factor and a component of malignant transformation. However, activation of the EGFR is likely to require complex interactions with other signaling pathways, as suggested by the requirement for cooperation between the EGFR and other growth factor receptors in tumorigenicity, or by the induction of apoptosis in both normal and cancer cells by the EGFR ligand TGF-alpha. The major goal of this proposal is to elucidate the complex network of interactions between EGFR and TGF-alpha, and the dynamic changes that occur in this network that are important in tumorigenicity and the process of differentiation. These studies will include gene knockdown with RNAi in breast cancer cells, the analysis of mutant H-ras in lung cancer, and the role of the EGFR in the TGF-beta induced changes in gene expression in lung epithelial cells.
