A: If you want to test whether a filename contains a certain substring, you can use the following regular expression: `\b(your_substring)+(?!.*\1)` The following code snippet exemplifies this:

public void CheckFiles() { Regex fileNameRegex = new Regex(@"\b(your_substring)+(?!.*\1)"); foreach (String path in Path.GetPaths(@"C:\your_directory\your_substring.ext")) { if (fileNameRegex.Match(path).Success) Console.WriteLine("The file contained the substring: {0}", path); } }

`\b` is a word boundary, which means it matches two characters - a word character and a non-word character, or vice versa. In your case, the word character is the underscore, and the non-word character is a space or a tab. So the expression matches every path that contains an underscore and a space or tab and does not contain the rest of the underscore+space+tab. `(?!.*\1)` is a negative look ahead. It asserts that the match will not be followed by the rest of the underscore+space+tab+suffix. The example code iterates through the paths that were filtered by your regex. If one of them matches, it is printed on your console.

"The cyber security firm CyberArk recently revealed it has reverse engineered the BlackBerry 10 operating system, meaning the company doesn't have to wait until BlackBerry switches over to Windows 10 Mobile for that public release." "CyberArk went on to state that in the unlikely event the company released a device that looked a lot like a BlackBerry 10 handset, it would be possible to wipe the device and install Android on it if it didn't, end up with the same device, running the same operating system." The last official BlackBerry 10 smartphone is the Z10, but numerous leaks have appeared in the past months to suggest that BlackBerry will be switching all devices to Android from the beginning of 2016, with plans to transition BlackBerry to Android and Windows 10 in 2017. The cybersecurity firm said that the BlackBerry
