Gas turbine engines, such as those that power modern commercial and military aircraft, generally include a compressor section to pressurize an airflow, a combustor section to burn a hydrocarbon fuel in the presence of the pressurized air, and a turbine section to extract work from the resultant combustion gases. The compressor section typically includes high and low pressure compressors. The high pressure compressor typically includes a high spool comprising a rotor assembly that surrounds a rotary shaft. The rotor assembly includes a plurality of airfoils or airfoil portions that include rotating wheel or disk portions with stationary shroud or shroud portion fixed thereon. The rotor assembly is also supported from a compressor hub that surrounds the rotary shaft. The rotor assembly is supported within a housing of the compressor section. This is typically accomplished with a plurality of support bearings. The high spool is commonly supported by "gimbaled" bearing supports that are disposed between the compressor hub and the high spool. Typically, six support bearings are disposed in three rows of two on either side of the high spool. Each row comprises two bearings that are circumferentially spaced 180 degrees from one another. The support bearings are supported from the compressor

In the fabrication of semiconductor devices, various contaminants can be created by the various processes that are performed. Such contaminants can impact the yield and ultimate performance of the devices. As device geometries become smaller, it becomes more difficult to remove such contaminants. Chemical vapor deposition (CVD) and etching (Etch) processes are used frequently in semiconductor fabrication, and are typically performed at relatively low temperatures. Such processes can cause the formation of organometallic contaminants (OMCs) on surfaces of the semiconductor wafer. As device geometries shrink to the limits of current processing technology, the need for more stringent removal requirements of OMCs becomes increasingly important. In addition,

OMCs can also be introduced into surface layers by polishing. Contaminants can be classified as being organic or inorganic. Organic contaminants include organic substances, such as organic acids, esters, aldehydes, and organic salts. Inorganic contaminants include contaminants such as metal ions, metal oxides, metal clusters, inorganic anions (e.g. hydroxide or phosphate), and corrosion byproducts. Contaminant removal can be carried out in various ways. For example, stripping and cleaning can be used to remove inorganic contaminants, such as metal ions and corrosion byproducts. Anti-fouling and plasma etching may be used to remove organic contaminants such as salts. Dry etching may be used for removing organic contaminants such as organic acids and organic salts. Moreover, high-temperature wet cleaning and dry etching may be used for removing inorganic contaminants such as metal clusters and metal oxides. Wet cleaning can include the use of chemical or electrochemical solvents such as hot water, buffered detergent, hydrochloric acid, nitric acid, ammonium hydroxide, sodium hydroxide, potassium hydroxide, sulfuric acid, perchloric acid, hydrogen peroxide, ozone, or
