How to Reduce Expectations in Healthy People: A New Effective Approach to Health Care in the 21st Century. According to the 2010 National Health Interview Survey, 44 million adults in the United States are obese. Adults with a normal body weight are driving much of the healthcare spending. In the United States, individuals possessing three or more chronic diseases are spending 43% of their health care dollars on these diseases and 60% on chronic diseases if they are not controlled. Early detection of chronic conditions, management of conditions, and prevention contribute to optimal health outcomes and are associated with considerable cost savings. However, both clinical and research studies show that individuals who are overweight and obese are less likely to detect and report their symptoms. This article highlights the increasing relevance of treating the patient rather than the disease. It also addresses the complex medical needs of individuals who lack health insurance and are susceptible to medication and overutilization. Finally, it attempts to redefine the meaning of optimal health by redefining the role of the physician as a partner to the individual in promoting health, which will lead to a decrease in the frequency of healthcare utilization to the benefit of both the individual and the healthcare system. Improved practice management, population health management, and primary prevention of chronic diseases will lead to the greatest health efficiencies. In conclusion, diagnosis and treatment of patients are equally important in today's clinical practice as the diagnosis and treatment of conditions.
