Through creating an illusion of reality, people reach their greatest potential; through creating an illusion of happiness, people find peace. In a not too distant future, only a very narrow part of the population is capable of producing these types of illusions. Society is divided into two factions: one draws comfort from the illusion of reality, the other that of happiness. One group of people is conspiring to ensure the world will be flooded by the illusions of reality. In the second, a group of people is working to ensure the earth will be flooded by the illusions of happiness.

A: Panoptimo is a retro-inspired puzzle platformer set in a mystical world that sounds like it's going to be more like Myst than any other game. The game was released in 2016 and is still in development. Unlike most other games, Panoptimo's magic doesn't depend on a finite source of power. Instead, the world holds the power of balance, and that power is woven throughout the life of the world. The game features a meditative puzzle game style where you'll be manipulating shape-shifting blocks of light. The concept of Panoptimo is a thing you create in your mind. When we are asleep, the world is one solid entity. Then when we wake up, we are faced with a new world. We can't see our previous world — only the world we now occupy. And we want the old world back, so we recreate it. This is what we call Panoptimo. The game has no words (yet). Instead, the developers use art and music to captivate the player. The game is available for PC, Mac, and Linux. If you like this game, then take a look at the Kickstarter campaign to see if they'll be able to fund the game fully before the end of the year.

A: Like Swamp Thing said, there's Deponia. Not a "jump and run" game like most of the other answers, but still a 8-bit indie game. Deponia the Jupiter Spacefarer is a 2D, action-adventure puzzle game developed by Motiga and published by Adult Swim Games for Windows, Mac, and Linux on April 14, 2013. And also the Deponia movies.
