After its initial release, the developers behind the Midori browser decided to set their focus on Firefox OS and promise some improvements for that. Among the many changes brought in the latest version of the Midori browser for Android is a simple yet powerful privacy protection features. In this article, we'll take a look at this new privacy protection features and how to enable it. Cougar Browser Privacy Protection This one is pretty self-explanatory. Cougar Browser Privacy Protection is a settings page that allows you to add exceptions to the data that Cougar Browser saves about you. It also has a list of other settings that are being saved by Cougar Browser. For example, the websites that you've visited and the apps that you've used. Strict Privacy Protection The other privacy protection setting is called Strict Privacy Protection. It requires that the browser will request a permission from you that you didn't grant it. This is used to pre-fill the login credentials for the websites that you frequently visit. If you have granted Cougar Browser all of the permissions it needs then you'll still need to enter the login credentials. Otherwise, you'll be prompted with a permission request at the end of the process. Remember the login details that you use to log into the website by default. By default, the privacy settings that you've set are still visible to you. However, if you want to hide them, you can lock them in place using the quick settings menu. You can manually enable and disable the privacy protection features using the following settings: Privacy protection via Settings > Privacy protection > Turn privacy protection On / Off > Turn Privacy protection on / off Privacy protection for apps is turned Off by default so if you're browsing the internet via Cougar Browser, the browser will not request any permissions and your browsing data will not be saved or any data used by the browser is of no use to you. However, you can
