The number of keys tested depends on a few different factors. One factor is the order of the result output. The recommended order is the number of bytes tested, then the order of the amount of votes accrued for each byte. Then the times needed to crack each key. The times to crack each key varies depending on the amount of traffic on the network. The upper and lower bounds are a round number so you can accurately calculate how long to expect it to take. For example, if you start out with the lower bound of 40% and the upper bound of 300% of maximum capacity, you can expect the cracking to complete in 8 to 15 minutes. After cracking WEP using a brute force attack, the goal is to encrypt a wireless network. A list of ESSID's appear with a click of the mouse. The network administrator can then choose one to access the wireless network. A larger number of ESSID's is better since it keeps the likelihood of a random ESSID being the right one higher. To avoid this, if the user is interested in a single ESSID, the user can choose to save the ESSID to the custom access point list. This means that ESSID is automatically skipped during the process. Before the crack process begins, the user must enter a network name (E.G. home, school, etc), a password (which should be changed) and MAC address (which should be unique). The next screen prompts the user to enter any custom access point list they may have saved. If none are saved, the system creates an empty one with the one saved by the user earlier. Finally the user can select the keys to crack. After the cracking is complete, the user can view the list of saved ESSID's from the custom access point list.
